

There are situations that require telling the truth. To open the eyes to the one who moves towards a harmful vice. To help recognize the harm that one provokes in your family. To shake a sloth that slowly plunges a person called to serve others.

But it's hard to. What will the other person feel? Really, will a word of correction serve something? Wouldn't it be better to stay away from things that might not be arranged? What if those words then generate more damage than benefits?

The fear of being mistaken paralyzes. However, the situation requires providing aid so that someone can open their eyes to their situation and begin to change. So How do we do that?

There Is a simple way to jump into the adventure of the correction: to do it from the affection. Because a truth, even if it is painful, is more acceptable if the one who says it offers it with sincere love and touch full of respect.

Of Course, neither the best affection nor the most complete prudence is sufficient to achieve a satisfactory result. There Are hearts that react harshly to the slightest sign of an alien correction.

Despite the difficulties, when there are spaces for hope, it is worth a little effort to offer words that can help those in need and those who crave a change to the better in family relationships.

Those words, from affection, will be more effective if they are sustained by humble and confident prayer. You may does not see immediate results, but God comes to where we cannot go.

Despite the difficulties, when there are spaces for hope, it is worth a little effort to offer words that can help those in need and those who crave a change to the better in family relationships.

Those words, from affection, will be more effective if they are sustained by humble and confident prayer. You may do not see immediate results, but God comes to where we cannot go.

More than once we will note, with a pleasant surprise, that whoever receives words full of truth and advice in view of his own good, opens, looks at us grateful, and begins a way of conversion.

A path, we can not forget, that we also have to continually resume, aided by other brothers who, with that same affection, more than once explained to us that we have such or that defect.

We All need help on that wonderful path towards sincere and fruitful conversion. The help that comes when, from the affection, we know to give and receive a truth that corrects, and that opens the Hearts to the wonderful action of God that saves us.